

Relaxing in the sun during a sun bath is a natural behavior for chickens.

But also in the heat of the day the hens tend to find a shady spot to rest in when done with their sunbath.

By mid morning most of the hens have returned to the sheltered nesting and roosting area to lay the eggs. The eggs are laid in roll-a-way nests and gathered by hand. These eggs are carried to cool storage areas until collected by a truck to take them to a grading and packing plant.

More than “outside access”, our hens are at home outside. The early morning sun beckons their attention. But they were out before sunup!

Hens naturally like to stroll from their night shelter and find insects and bugs in the early morning hours.

Fresh morning air invigorates.

Dew drops refresh.

And happy chicken songs float over the countryside.

During suitable weather, the hens spend considerable time outside the shelter, searching for their own grub versus the ready-made-feed provided indoors. But even in the rain, the hens may spend some time checking out the possible menus for lunch.

No chemicals on pasture land

No antibiotics in feeds

No animal by-products

Humanly farmed on small family farms

Freedom in the field